

Making Peace with Paradise

Diane and I were swept away by a dream of foreign living thirty years ago, when I was merely middle-aged. Later, it happened again. We still live in both our dreams, but it hasn't been easy. This memoir targets the two travel destinations which caught us: Taormina in Sicily, plus a few Italian side trips, and a small, mainly self-contained village on Tortola in the British Virgin Islands. The double focus enriches each portrait. In Italy during our first year together, we were exploring each other; we laid a sweet fearful patina of romance over our autumn in Venice and our long winter in Taormina. After thirty years we still return each year to Taormina. The book describes those early times, and also how the place feels to us in these later years, its many-layered textures, its intricate network of personalities, its richness in beauty and history. It also describes life in the West Indian fishing village where for fifteen years we've been the only non-Tortolan landowners. Our house is on the main road in the middle of the village. In this tropical climate where people live outside most of the time, we are immersed in village life. Its textures, its personalities, its beauty and history, all are shown to be as complex as those of Taormina. Within these two versions of paradise, the challenges and the rewards for foreigners living there are a recurrent theme. The difficulties are superficially different, but in each case, when the stranger finally learns to take the host culture on its own terms, the rewards are immense. Making Peace with Paradise demonstrates the common humanity we all share.
